BRIOTIX HEALTH offers free virtual office technology app to help home-based office workers avoid musculoskeletal injuries

CENTENNIAL, CO – March 25, 2020

In response to Covid-19, Briotix Health is offering office-based employees that are now working from home, access to the BxPro Virtual Office technology app free of charge.

Through the app, workers can access help setting up their home offices correctly, understand and apply ergonomic risk prevention behaviors, and get access to a wealth of informational resources on working safely at home to avoid common ergonomic discomforts such as back, neck, and wrist strains.

“As an injury prevention company, we believe we are in a unique position to support our community through socially meaningful efforts by utilizing our resources to help the population at large,” said Stephen Brown, Briotix Health CEO. “We hope by offering this resource to workers who now find themselves in temporary home workspaces, we can help them make their workspace as comfortable and safe as possible.”

In addition to the free tools being offered on the app, users can sign-up for live one-on-one Ergo Coaching with an Ergonomist to review their personal workspace for individual recommendations and risk identification.

If employers or employees wish to access the application, they can do so by visiting <https://virtualoffice.briotix.works>.

Briotix Health will provide free access to the app and the educational materials as the pandemic response proceeds, but for no less than 30 days.
